

The College of Arts and Sciences

Film at 11

It's true: The TV studio at the University of New Haven is on par with that of ESPN, the sports network. To give students a true sense for what a TV studio looks and feels like, the University, with the help of the Vlock family, installed state-of-the-art equipment including monitors, a switcher, a character generator, and a host of other TV equipment that serves Communication students well.

"We'll be able to take what we learn here and immediately apply it to a job," said Jeff Guerrero '08, as he sat one day last spring in an equipment room that is part of the Communication lab. Students learn while working the TV monitors, writing, filming and editing shows put on by students; creating and filming news segments; coordinating graphics and more.

In the TV studio recently, several students were seated on a raised platform, chatting, as other students videotaped their conversation. Said Celina Natola '09, "When I'm placed in a new environment with this equipment, I won't be afraid of it."

"We'll be able to take what we learn here and immediately apply it to a job."

